The value of this project lies in the Aristotelian theory 'the whole is greater than the sum of its parts'. A collection of spaces unified by their geometry and finishes creates a coherent environment, while encouraging an appreciation of the grand botanical surroundings.

Described in 1912 as "the finest collection in the State (hardly excepting the Botanical Gardens) of palms, cedars, firs, oaks and other rare and beautiful shade and foliage trees", the established trees at Tusmore Avenue Palms, provided the catalyst for the strategic arrangement of raised decks, garden beds, steel pergolas, timber screens and a swimming pool. The result is a collection of straight-lined external spaces and built forms that engage intimately with the established flora.

The project provides shelter for carparking, outdoor dining and children's play, combined with spaces for swimming, exercising, relaxation and even a stage for performing.
